The process of human development is complex, dynamic and a diverse phenomenon which makes it increasingly challenging and perplexing. Human Development is a product of many strands - the blending of the biological and the cultural; the intertwining of thought and feeling and the synthesis of inner stirrings and external pressures. The process begins with conception and continues throughout life. It takes as many different courses as there are people in the world, for every human being develops in a unique way, embedded in the context of his or her genetic predisposition and the environment.

Human Development is a diverse field of study which explores human beings through observations and empirical research. Over the years, attitude toward different stages of life span has changed widely. Life span studies include a panorama of aspects like well being, learning, cognition, personality, mental health, family adjustments and conflicts, disabilities, abuse, psycho-emotional support systems and many others. To gain the knowledge regarding various significant subjects related to human life, the field of Human Development is closely interdependent on the knowledge and expertise of multiple disciplines, which explain the occurrence of a given behavior in a specific situation. The contribution of multi disciplinary research provides both insight and clarity to the behavior in question. This also provides a 'holistic' view of the human beings.

This conference invites contributions from multiple disciplines like Human Development and Family Studies, Psychology, Education, Counseling, Social Work, Child Welfare, Cognition and Neurosciences, Sociology, Anthropology, Economics, Law, Management and others; and focuses on various research areas of life span development from conception to ageing.
